Introduction

In Tomorrow's World: Money who needs it!

Are you concerned about the recent downturn in events; finance depreciation, job losses and share prices falling, together with previous well-established businesses failing?

Well you're not alone!

More and more people are in danger of losing a sizeable slice of their income and assets through at least one of the above scenarios. If you are in constant threat of having your lifestyle taken away from you, then you are feeling exactly the same as a vast majority of people in the rest of the world.

Here at 'In Tomorrow's World', we have a possible answer. Something so radical, yet in some ways this appears to be a self-fulfilling prophecy that we would have reached eventually, although not until much further in the future or when the whole economic system had completely broken down.

No matter how the governments of this world believe they can keep shoring up the problems with a temporary damage control, these issues keep leaking out and will continue to do so, unless we make the effort to rethink and solve them right at the heart.

Reading about these temporary measures in any newspaper or online websites; it all sounds so promising when finance forecasters say this is just a small glitch and the upturn is just around the corner. Well, no matter how many corners we turn, we will eventually come back to ourselves and meet the very same problems we were trying to escape from.

They just keep coming!

We sincerely believe we have the only answer to remove these problems. In our Book: In Tomorrow's World: Money - who needs it! You can read about the total 'solution'; it will certainly have you questioning, 'why has no-one thought of this before'.

Or have they?

Perhaps they had but were prevented from releasing details; well now you can read all of it! Learn the secret about what is possible; you owe it to yourself to know the truth!

Preface

From the title of this book, you might be forgiven for thinking that the author (me), has found a way to live as frugally as possible, thereby offering a solution to all who wish to follow by example.

And if you are thinking that, then you are in some way right!

But my solution goes way beyond good economics or being extremely thrifty.

What I propose, will probably have you ranting and maybe choosing to heave this book out of the window and into the nearest dustbin.

But before you get that far, I urge you to finish the reading of this and if possible, read it more than once because only by doing that, will you come to realise that what I propose, is not only entirely possible but is probably the only way forward for us, (the human race), if we wish to survive long into the future with a good and comfortable lifestyle, whilst maintaining the environment and ensuring the continuance of our planet, Earth.

Chapter 1 - The Root of all evil?

For most of us today, money is at the heart of everything we do or conversely, don't do.

We work anywhere between 34 to 48 hours in any week, to earn an income that will, we hope, sustain us and our families in a reasonable fashion. And by that, I mean, have enough money to cover the payment of essential bills: gas, electricity, tax, rates and food etc. Once those are taken care of, we then look to funding other 'necessities'.

1). the cost of running a car or maybe two or three, which includes petrol (gas), insurance, maintenance, and road tax.

2). Basic white goods for the home.

Washing Machine

Fridge-Freezer

Dishwasher

Tumble Dryer.

3). Entertainment in the form of meals out, television, DVD player, home theatre, computer and games consoles.

4). Maintenance of your home and garden, security, swimming pool upkeep (if you have one).

Now you might think that some of the items listed as necessities, are really not necessary to living. But there has to be a quality to living, otherwise why bother. And as time moves forward, other 'necessities' will take their place, products will improve and incorporate more multi-functions.

So, we find employment that we hope will give us the income to maintain our chosen lifestyle.

But this is where some of the problems start to begin.

We earn our income, but then the government takes its' slice for Tax and National Insurance (in the UK) and for wherever you the reader lives, your respective government also delves into your pay-packet at the end of each month and removes a portion of your hard-earned money.

So, there you are, with slightly less than you hoped for in your pay-packet and now begins the never-ending struggle to meet the demands of your essential bills.

Your earned income, (wages), probably gets transferred directly in to your bank account. From there, your bills are paid, perhaps by direct debit or standing order.

For groceries and other small purchases, you no doubt use your debit card (bank card). You make your weekly trek to the grocery store (super-market), load up your trolley with all manors of goodies and at the checkout handover your store loyalty card, together with your bank debit or credit card, to pay for everything.

The money is electronically debited from your bank account, your loyalty card registers how much you have spent and on what and your monthly bank balance is now considerably reduced even further.

You then happily load up your car with your purchases and on your way out from the store car-park; probably decide to fill up your car with gas (petrol). Another purchase, and another depletion from your bank account total.

For most of us, dependent upon where you live, this is probably a very regular occurrence, happening with precision like moves every month or perhaps, fortnight.

Food is definitely a necessity!

So now that your bank account balance is reduced by your visits to the grocery store, petrol station and also from your monthly direct debits and standing orders, you now have to decide what the meagre balance left can be used for.

Entertainment is a definite possibility, after all there is that big ball game that you desperately want to take the family to, or perhaps there is a show that you wish to take a loved one to for an anniversary. What ever your form of entertainment involves, it is personal and essential to each individual.

So there goes another slice of income from your bank account.

Now in all this time of making purchases, paying bills, buying goodies and things to make us feel good, has any 'actual money' ever passed through your fingers; probably not!

So, why do we need money, the currency? We could just have a form of a credit system.

For so many hours worked, you would receive an allotted amount of credits to your account. Then, when making purchases or paying bills, said credits would be deducted from your account, in a similar fashion as money is currently removed.

Now, whilst this might seem a really good idea, making it easier to purchase items, no longer having to wait for a 3 or 4 day period for a cheque to clear your bank account, as is currently the norm, should you be paid in this fashion; perhaps you receive funds for services you offer, such as working as a gardener or mechanic, and you are paid only on a job by job basis.

This credit system still wouldn't address the real issue that people everywhere have in today's or even tomorrow's society, and that is the very big difference between the poor and the rich (well-off).

Chapter 2 – The Rich get richer and the Poor get poorer.

The Poor

Anyone today, can open any newspaper in any part of the world and read about the differences between the very poor and the very rich.

In many regions of the third world, there are still people who not only have never received any form of education, they have no real knowledge of how things are in this world of ours and they live on an income so low, just a few pounds (dollars), that it almost defies imagination as to how they survive. And that is just what they do, they survive.

They have no luxuries or even necessities. No clean running water, no food to purchase from the local store. Everything they eat has to be either grown and harvested, or killed by their own hands.

Can you imagine what or how you (persons from the western world), would go about achieving that. No nice necessities, no running water, no food easily purchased, no car to take you to work in comfort no matter what the weather conditions. And probably no work either. Would you like to live in this way? I know that I would not. And yet we expect and assume that a third of the world's population will happily go on doing so.

Imagine how education and better living conditions could improve their lives. And with this better education, what geniuses might appear. What untapped potential is left lying dormant and unfulfilled because they have such poor living conditions. How might we all benefit if their conditions were improved.

The Rich

If you read any magazine or watch the television you cannot help but be aware of the rich and famous. They are everywhere. Actors, actresses, pop-stars, sports persons, politicians, peers of the realm, royalty, CEO's of Business; no matter where you go you cannot help but be envious of all that they have.

Some would say that they deserve it, as they have the talent, have worked or earned it or were even born to it.

But aren't you just a little bit jealous that such wealth comes to those few, that seem to have no more merits to their soul than you or I.

Why does such wealth and fame come to these special few?

Why not to all?

Why indeed!

We seem to make idols of these rich and famous people. Give them a higher standing than others; those who have just worked diligently all their life and not caused one ounce of trouble. Yet these lesser-known people seem to go through life, barely making ends meet; also, only surviving.

So it would seem that once you have 'made it', you certainly make sure that you never relinquish your money, your prestige, your standing in the community, your clout. You've got it, and woe betides anyone who tries to take it from you.

Money is an insulator.

It protects you from the masses, from feeling helpless.

It ensures your survival.

It gives you confidence.

It surrounds you with a protective wall, so that nothing unpleasant can penetrate.

You're safe!

So, in each of these living conditions, rich or poor, they both have their own surviving standards.

Irrespective of how much money you have or don't have, you still possess this need to survive, to be protected, to hang on for dear life to that which you own. Just because you have money and a healthy bank balance, doesn't change how you feel. Your inherent survival instincts are the same as your poorer neighbours; you just think you're safer.

Chapter 3 - The Solution?

If I said to you that there was a way to live comfortably, with plenty of food to eat, to work at a job that gives you self-esteem and satisfaction, to have and enjoy entertainment in all its forms, to take holidays and make visits to friends and family whenever you wish, and to do it all without money, would you think I was living in a dream world?

Well, perhaps you're right because I think it would be a perfect dream.

And that is what I am proposing!

Having read through the first chapters, you realise that after earning your income (if you're lucky enough to have a job that is), your wage goes into your bank account and for the most part, you never actually see the money. You might have a few coins in your pocket for the toll-machine or to give a tip at a restaurant (although normally they now add a percentage automatically), but basically apart from that, you never really see the money that you earn.

It is all digital nowadays, numbers on a printout from the local ATM or on your bank statement.

For so long now we have been accepting this method of financial transactions; that we never really think about having actual currency in our hands. And who would really want to carry such large sums of money that would be needed, to be able to purchase the necessary products and services; $300 plus for weekly shopping, $60 for gardeners, $50 for petrol (gas) and $1500 plus a month for mortgage re-payments. Carry that amount of cash on your person would be a robbery just waiting to happen.

And then the only people to benefit from these situations would be the lawyers.

The jails would be packed to the hilt with every kind of criminal, the court systems would grind to a halt and society would slowly break down. Not something anyone would wish to happen, although in some ways, a scenario like this is already in the process of happening.

Crime figures are up, serious crimes more so. Knife crime is going rampant and we are now no longer safe on the streets, even in daylight and this is apart from the ever present fear of terrorism.

But poor people are slowly starting to realise that they are never going to have the income to be able to take those few extra steps up the ladder of success. They reach an age where they suddenly start to understand that their pursuit of the unobtainable is what keeps the rich, rich.

The never-ending circle or wheel of life as they know it, does not allow for them ever to catch up and attain their desires. They start to feel cheated and angry, that only a few special people reach what they cannot. It does not mean that in any way are they less smart or accomplished than their richer counterparts, just that they never had the opportunity to get to that certain point.

If every person was given the same opportunity, just think what we could achieve. Unimaginable heights in science, medicine, the arts, social welfare and humanitarian pursuits, would be just the beginning. The mind soars when it starts to realise just what would be attainable, if everyone were truly equal.

But to attain this equality, we would need to radically rethink our whole economic structure and how we choose to live.

So, are you ready for this?

Well, here goes!

Hang on to your hats, you're about to have your whole world changed.....

Chapter 4 – Money, what money?

I propose that we DO AWAY WITH MONEY, that we no longer use money (currency), to live.

We very rarely see any of our hard-earned income; it disappears digitally at the speed of light.

So, why continue with this outmoded form of living.

I say, BURN IT! SHRED IT! GET RID OF IT ALL!

Shocked?

You will be.

Read on....

To attain this new form of existence is going to take some radically new thinking for everyone.

Think you can't live without money; think again!

If you can visualise the currency life cycle wheel, you will see how although money plays its role in the wheel, if you completely remove it, life will still go on. More than that, it will go on much better.

If you take money out of the equation, the work, play, life cycle still revolves and evolves. The only difference would be, we 'work' for the betterment of all.

In the whole structure of provide and purchase, money does not have to be included.

For instance:

Suppose there are natural resources which need to be obtained.

A worker will dig or excavate them.

This natural product then goes to the manufacturing process.

The process takes place and is then passed on to the consumer (you or me), to use.

Similarly, products are grown and harvested, manufactured and transferred to consumers.

Houses are built and given to people to live in.

In turn, these people go out to work, to help in the manufactured and process of other industries.

Each in turn contributes to the cycle of manufacturing, processing and consumption. We all would do our individual part to make the cycle work. And in return for this work, we are provided with a home, food to eat, the opportunity to have entertainment and holidays; to study and progress in any chosen field.

All that we would need to do, is work at our preferred job for half of a working week and for the other half, work at an alternate work position. This end-week position could be rotated monthly so, ultimately, no-one would have to do any menial task, because there would be no menial work. Every job would carry the same status because all work is essential. There would be no high status, irrespective of what you do.

If you are fortunate enough to have a special talent like singing, or are gifted as an artist, then you also can have this as part of your work week, but still work the other half in a more necessitous position, something that will benefit all.

But you will not receive any higher distinction than someone who cleans the streets or empties dustbins. You would be recognised for your talents, but receive no other gain. As would someone who cleans the streets; if they perform especially diligently, then they too would receive praise. As each work position is equally beneficial to all.

So, what to do with all that money that we no longer need?

I suggested that we either BURN IT, SHRED IT or GET RID OF IT!

Taking the amount of money in circulation world-wide, burning it would keep the furnaces' of industry going for some considerable time. Precious gems and gold can also be used in scientific research, improving technology, medical instrumentation, space technology and more.

Alternatively, recycling the paper might also put it to good use, if we can find an appropriate one. Take your choice. Which would you prefer?

But what ever choice you think is right, the money has to go!

Either way, money would no longer be legal.

Anyone trying to purchase products or services, or considers using it to coerce any other person to their own benefit, would be guilty of the highest crime.

If you take away the option of anyone using money to improve their lifestyle to the detriment of another person, then this crime immediately ceases.

Without the gain, there is no reward.

If everyone has the same, what use is crime? Without banks, there can be no robbery.

This might seem an unrealistic possibility but, when you have nothing or very little, the chance to have what you want, often urges a crime spree. Take away the nothing or very little and replace it with all that you need or could want, the crime spree also goes away.

The difference in the mind when you no longer have outstanding bills hanging over your head, when you know that you can have the pleasures of your dreams, is quite euphoric.

Until you experience that feeling, you cannot say that this proposition would not work.

In other words, to quote an idiom, don't sack the cook until you've tasted the meal.

Just imagine this world; where you could work at your favourite occupation, work to help the whole community, have holidays and entertainment to keep you happy and relaxed. Always have sufficient food to feed your family. Know that your children can go to college and university, without the struggle of trying to save for it; it is their right. Study and learn new skills, reach new heights of achievement in any field, contributing to the betterment of all humanity.

Surely that is incentive enough to rid ourselves of the evil of money.

Can you visualise it? Do you think it is possible?

Only time will tell if this is the right way to go.

But I believe that this is an essential possible future for us.

Chapter 5 – the Realisms

Taking into account the whole idea of living without actual money, may seem to be completely impossible and I'm not saying it isn't going to take the best minds, together with our finest computers to make this dream come true. But I still think we could make it a reality.

Examining the work and life cycle, you will find it still turns, even when you remove the money aspect from it.

People need to work.

Products need to be made and consumed.

Entertainment has to be provided and utilised.

Everything will still go around in the cycle (life wheel); the only difference is that we do it without money. We very rarely physically use the paper currency these days, so to remove it from the cycle will not take much strategy. It is only a state of mind and if you can obtain all that you need without currency, why have it? It only promotes avariciousness, frustration, longing, dissatisfaction and envy.

Without it, all of our lives would be so much the richer.

Imagine a world:

....with no crime, no hunger, no poverty and no illness.

Is it possible?

Of course it is; we just need to be willing to work for it!

Chapter 6 – Money, I've got it and I'm keeping it.

For all you 'rich' people out there, take note. Your time of being at the top of the hierarchy is coming to an end.

I would suggest you examine your reasons for trying to hang on to your money.

Is it greed, a case of them and us or we're better than them, or money gives us power. If you can still have a good productive life, why would you need your money?

At least two-thirds of the world's population don't have it and they seem to manage okay.

Not well, but okay.

So why not balance the equation and make everyone equal?

Don't like the thought of handing it over; "it's mine, mine"! You say.

Well, here's a thought. Once the changeover takes place, your money won't buy you a thing. It will be obsolete, worthless and have absolutely no value to you, so you might just as well burn it!

Want to know why?

Whereas you might have previously purchased goods and services by utilising your coveted money, now that will no longer be necessary. People, who worked for you prior to the change-over, will no longer need your money to obtain the necessities they use. And as you will no longer be able to purchase ANYTHING with money, why keep it.

There will be no banks, so you can't keep it there. You cannot buy anything with it, so it will be as useless as rubbish.

Anyone thinking they can use your money, after you have purchased products and services from them will also be in for a shock. They will not be able to BUY anything with money and trying to do so, will just place all concerned in the justice system.

Although personally, I think that the concept of living without money soon brings its own reward.

And I believe that once people truly understand the whole concept of living without money, they will never want to go back. Each person will be totally free and beholden to no other. Each person works for the benefit of him/herself and for everyone else. Not to do so, means that you would become a social outcast, someone to be pitied because you don't have the wisdom to understand how better life has become.

If you are thinking that the idea of living in a society without money seems to be associated with the Russian Revolution idea of a classless society, you couldn't be more wrong. For them, they simply overthrew one tyrannical authority for a different kind. They were still governed by greedy powers trying to manipulate the masses for their own ends.

My concept is completely different. Without money there can be no greed. If every person is treated equally and is equal to every other person, then there can be no avarice, envy, jealousy, hate, fear.

- we would all have the same.
- we would all be the same.
- individuals as people but still the same!
- unique, yet the same!

Chapter 7 – How would we live?

For our routine day to day living, things would barely change.

We all need to work, so our working week would be divided in to two parts. Working one half in our chosen profession and the other in a task allocated, that would benefit all.

These work tasks would be rotated, so everyone would be allocated all available tasks within their own capabilities, unless they wish to train for something else.

Now as far as a profession like doctors are concerned, obviously you wouldn't want an inexperienced person treating a patient. But this doesn't mean they, (the doctors), also wouldn't share tasks between them, until such time as more people wishing to train as doctors were available or when medical knowledge reaches an as yet unattained, nanotechnology detection and healing procedure.

Doctors could be allocated medical tasks for their other half-week; emptying bed-pans, tidying cup-boards, cleaning hospital wards or even acting as nurses.

No job is menial, if the person doing the work knows that it is not and with no wage or class structure to distinguish it as such, no one feels they are doing any form of work that is beneath them.

For the production of large items we use on a regular basis, this will need to employ major recycling.

If a family has a car that is able to carry five persons, then said car could be recycled every 3/5 years. Different models of car would carry different recycle periods. You would simply go and choose a new model after the period is up. The model you have relinquished is then melted or broken down to be reused elsewhere, if not as another vehicle, then in some other form of industry.

But the underlying message must be:

RECYCLE EVERYTHING.

Packaging from products must all be recycled, nothing is to be wasted. And what cannot be recycled must be used for the furnaces in industry.

Cleaner technology must be strived for.

As hydrogen cars are already available, albeit their mileage per gallon is not yet extensive, this is a possible way to move forward.

Other forms of electric cars must be designed.

Innovation must take precedence.

One new idea is for a compressed air vehicle; this would be totally clean and has minimum impact on the environment.

Food as an industry is in need of a major overhaul. Currently we rely far too heavily on wheat production. Our bodily requirements are being badly managed by what products are available.

Too many additives are introduced to keep our food fresh, whereas extracting all air and hermetically sealing them would be a far better option and would also mean that smaller portions (daily ones), could be package in a weekly format. Locally grown produce must also be in the forefront of your food purchases.

All of these options and many more new ones can be managed by our computers, of which, even these will progress to become more environmentally friendly.

Their extensive ability can function currently somewhere in the region of 2 trillion calculations per second. We must use the technology to activate and implement this new concept, of life without money.

I think we owe it to ourselves, now that we are firmly in the 21st Century, to begin a new life path.

Are you with me.....?

Chapter 8 – Can we do this?

Looking at some of the more recent tragic world events, I think it is case of 'not can we do this but that we should be doing it now', if we aim to have any form of a happy, stable society for the future; not just for ourselves but for our children and all future generations to come.

Reading the news and seeing all the atrocities that are committed in the name of greed, religious idolatry, racial persecution and social hatred, makes me realise that if we allow society to carry on in this way without addressing the 'whole' problem and not just individual issues, then this 'problem' is likely to be the complete breakdown of social society and brings about total anarchy and destruction of our present world.

The poorer part of society, are no longer willing to tolerate this great divide between the haves and the have-nots and the governments just offering to bail out certain problem areas with hand-outs isn't the answer. It's like trying to cover a severed vein, with a small plaster.

Whilst it temporarily might stop the blood flow, the flow is too strong and will eventually seep through and saturate it.

Which is what is happening now, to the whole world. No matter what country you look at, there seems to be insurmountable issues arising daily and all any government seems to want to do, is just cover it with a small plaster.

And it isn't just the issue of having a better standard of living, if we take on this lifestyle of living without money. If you also think of some of the really bad problem areas, that having and using money perpetuates, like the illegal Drug use as an example:

For drug dealers and users, money is the stick that drives this particular putrid wheel.

A user starts and gets hooked on drugs.
He/she steals to buy said drugs.

A drug dealer gets his drugs from one of the drug barons in a cartel. Huge amounts of money are now flowing around this degenerate wheel.

So, if you remove the money from this scenario, a drug user can get help with their addiction, the drug dealer now has no clients, and no money to buy from the drug baron and this also impacts to the drug cartel. With no-one buying drugs and no money in circulation, where are their profits now!

This will also impact to the prostitution rings and child slavery markets that are now so apparent in every city.

Without money for them to make profits, you immediately take away the power from the perpetrators and without their power they are nothing and no threat to anyone, except perhaps themselves.

It would not take long for them to realise that this new society we have established, has now no need and desire to allow continuance of their previous depraved drug-driven existence.

It is hoped that they can come to terms with the new world but they have the choice of living in it or not.

I believe that everyone has the right to have made mistakes and learn by them but if they choose not to learn by theirs', then having the option to end their lives is their right.

But ironically, what probably made them good drug barons i.e. business management, people skills, stock control deployment and more, could still benefit them if they chose to join the new society.

If their upbringing was the only one they knew and had no choice but to follow it or become a dead casualty, then there might still be a chance they could change and contribute, to this new world without money, by being educated in this new lifestyle.

But I'm thinking, from this side of the drug society, there is going to be much opposition to the idea of a money free world.

When you take into account the huge amounts of money currently being made by such people, they definitely will not want to give their lifestyle up without a fight!

And the opposition is not only going to come from the dregs of current society. There is also going to be a tremendous blockage to it, by the so-called elite of the world.

They already have all that they need (but of course they still want more), so why would they agree to give any of it up. They feel so safe in their proverbial paid for ivory-towers; secure that the lesser beings of society cannot impact upon their way of life.

But this really is just an illusion.

Irrespective of their, yours or anyone else's standing in society, nature has a way of levelling the playing field. One global catastrophe and we would be back living in the dark ages; so what use would money be then.

I'm not saying that anything of that magnitude is likely to be happening in the next hundred years but nor would I say that it couldn't. If we don't start to change our way of life, life might just decide to change it for us and I know which scenario I prefer.

Chapter 9 – Religion: a necessary evil?

So, going through the process of completely changing the way we live, would seem to dictate that we need to change the way we view religion.

Believing in the fundamental good of all is very simplistic but, it is a good place to start. Yet I wonder whether we should be contributing this goodness, to a belief in any religious denomination.

When we start as children, we are given the rights of passage into the religion of our parents. We follow that belief until such time in our emerging adulthood, where we seek to question and sometimes even change these beliefs.

So, now armed with all this new knowledge about the oh-so many different religions practised in the world, we now make a choice in to what we believe as the ‘true’ religion.

For myself, I stopped being a practising Christian when I started questioning the whole essence of religion and why we need it. Why do we need to believe in some mythical eternal being, to be a ‘good’ person?

If you’re concerned about people, the welfare of animals, the state of the planet and the environment and the future of the whole world, then, in other words you are caring! So, it doesn’t follow that you have to be religious to be caring.

Therefore, in this new money free world we would create, religion is going to take a back-seat.

Everyone has the right to believe in which ever god/religion they choose but, it will be kept private to their own home and can never be thrust upon anyone else.

As an example of the worse kind of religious zeal, power hungry greed and pomposity for instance, the wealth of the Catholic Church says it all; for here would be enough money to feed most of the poorest nations.

When you see religious persons wearing gold, ermine and other expensive finery, you might question their true ethical values.

Are they not putting their own comforts before the poor and destitute? Why do they need such comforts, when there are so many poor in the world?

If they truly have such a principled religion, can they not just as easily practise this in lesser garments? Or do they believe that their appearance is more important than the message they are trying to represent. And I don't just mean their individual appearance but how the Catholic Church is portrayed as being so opulent and powerful. The money part is speaking again and we are meant to feel that they have the power of insight because of it. But this is not so!

Any religion is only as powerful as the number of people who believe in it.

Money, fine clothes, opulent furnishings and magnificent buildings do not depict the religion, irrespective of which one it is; be it Christ, Buddha, Allah, the one God of the Jews or any other number of lesser known religions.

If any one person believes that there is something more to life and wishes to interpret this as a religion, then that is their right.

Yet why do they need this belief to be given authority by some ecclesiastical establishment. Do they not believe that the religion speaks for itself?

One of the many irritants I find in regard to any of the more well-known religions, is the constant placement of fear upon its followers, should they not maintain any of the depicted rituals. Some of these rules and rituals in regard to the allowance of being a believer are just not reasonable or ethical.

One has to ask, why any Deity would impose some of these but does it come from the Deity or is it just a rule imposed by man, to keep the followers dancing in circles to a totally different tune.

It ultimately means that the believer must dance attendance to these rules, if they wish to be the perfect follower.

But surely you should be asking yourself, what right anyone has, be it deity or (hu)(wo)man, to ask another to demean themselves in this fashion, to the humour of another.

If there is a God, no matter which religion he/she/it is related to, I certainly do not believe any deity worth anything, would have such a penchant for such barbaric practises.

What would be the point to them? What do any of them merit? If you really take a long hard look at some of these practises and I won't outline any one particular religion here, some of them are really quite perverse.

So, if you think that some Deity is worthy of being worshipped, yet you are willing to adhere to such practises, I question your mindset.

I see no reason why anyone would allow anybody to demean them in that way, certainly not under the auspices of religious fervour.

We must all believe in one another and not just some mythical deity to keep us good and faithful or in the belief that 'they' will provide all the answers we need to survive.

As I said, religion in the home is one thing but bringing it out to the world and dictating that other people should only believe in one or your religion, is not something we should allow for this new world. I would question why anyone needs such a prop to live by.

There is no reason not to be good and kind; you don't need any religion to tell you that or to qualify your actions if you follow that creed.

There is more harm done in the name of religion, than almost any other form. We are told we will go to hell if we don't believe this creed or that one; if we don't practise certain rituals or give up certain foods for specific periods.

What right does anyone have to impose this kind of fear technique on a susceptible congregation? Yet it goes on daily through-out all religious sects.

Why do people follow it?

Because they are too scared not to!

"Fear is the enemy of the susceptible -

- and the power of the perpetrator".

Take away that fear and the perpetrator loses his power.

Ecclesiastical establishments would lose all their money and power if people realised that it is possible to believe in a religion, without the need to have that belief qualified.

If the particular religion you practise gives you a happier life, then why would you need approval of some power hungry individuals? You are only feeding their iconic status; it has nothing to do with how you believe, nor will it make you a better follower of your religion.

If you need that sort of approval, then there is something wrong with your belief and I would suggest you take a much deeper look into why you need it.

For myself, after discarding the scare tactics of the Christian religion, I decided that I would investigate any and everything, before I hand over my mind and soul to another religious sect.

So far, I've yet to find one that doesn't try and contradict all others. Yet they all seem to be offering the same things but with different words.

Does this mean there is only one religion but with different names? Or, that there is no religion and we cannot hear the inner message for the fear.

But, for this new world, religion will not be the dominatrix that it has been in the past.

There will be no money or power hungry establishments feeding on the fear of the follower, just people believing in and doing good things.

Chapter 10 – Are you willing to work for it?

So by now, if you haven't thrown this book out of the window or into the dustbin, I'm hoping you are starting to see the possibilities of living in a world without money.

I haven't highlighted all areas where we can improve, (this will come in a future book) but the ones I have, I believe to be the essential starting points.

This will be no mean undertaking to change the whole world and its reliance on money and allure.

But I hope that this work gives you an insight in to what I am trying to achieve.

If you are one of the lower income earners, your world will only improve. It will take away all the pressure of trying to find the necessary funds to live and prosper.

No more making promises to yourself, that if you can get through this month, you will do better next and if you can just pay this bill, you know you can get through the month til next pay day.

We've all done this and said all the same things, in the hope that circumstances will improve.

But ultimately, all you're really doing is existing from one pay cheque to the next; and this is not living.

For you, the release will be so heady, it will almost be euphoric!

I want you to just sit there for a moment and really think about how your life will change.

No more bills, in any shape or form.

Enough food to feed every member of your family and all your pets.

A reliable car(s) to use for work and play.

A decent sized home to live in; no rabbit hutches!

A job you can be proud of and which benefits all.

Knowing that your children will have the same opportunities and good lifestyle, excellent education and will be able to become the providers of the next generation.

To take your family for holidays, meals out and just enjoy life again.

But most of all, to know that this lifestyle will not end or be taken from you; it is yours' by right.

So, for you, the future is very bright but what of the current rich and elite, how will they fare?

I think for the most part it will come as a great shock, to think that they have to give away all their money and will become like the rest of us.

There will be many who will try and say that this new world will not work or that anarchy will happen and the whole of society will breakdown.

But this is just the scaremongering of the terrified, not wanting to give up their precious assets to try something better.

But you must have pity on them, for they are about to realise how insufficient and temporary, their perceived idea of security is.

It would not have mattered how much money they accumulated, it would never have been enough. They were trying to fill a hole with no bottom. Only by living free from money can they realise how wonderful life can be.

So now we need to try and implement the procedures to start this new world off.

Depending on how many people read this book, will indicate how quickly we can start.

So talk to as many people as you can or direct them to the website and this book, so that they can read about the 'living free from money' proposal.

The more people who know, the quicker we can start and I for one am very eager to begin this new chapter.

Chapter 11- Conclusion

In writing this book I haven't inserted facts and figures for the areas discussed because I didn't want to turn you off the reading of it, by quoting such exacting and dare I say, sometimes boring information. The details are out there to be had should you wish to look for them and I certainly hope you will.

Find out for yourself how the world currently is, if you don't already know and what the respective governments are trying to do, to cover up the inescapable mess we are all in.

Ask questions, check facts and think about what you might be giving up, if you fail to get this new 'Free from Money' world started.

This idea will work if we want it to and we are the only ones who can make it happen.....!

Are you going to be one of those.....?

I really hope so.....!

Because mine and everyone else's future, is relying on you.....!

'Que'
